

IOWA REGISTERED HIGHWAY ROUTES 1914-1925

There were few guides for travelers crossing Iowa in 1838 when it was organized as a territory, and travelers often became lost or wandered far out of their way. The 1838 Territorial Government authorized the first state roads, and the federal government appropriated money to expedite the movement of soldiers. The Territorial Government used the federal money for laying out a road from Dubuque to Keokuk via Iowa City, and this was the beginning of what was to become a 112,000-mile system of roads and streets in Iowa. The original roads followed the high ground of the state, and were known as ridge roads; but as the state was settled, roads began to follow section lines to accommodate landowners.

The early roads were used mainly by farmers to move their goods to town, with railroads handling most of the long-distance travel until the early 1900s. Even then, there were 104,000 miles of roads in the state when the first road inventory was taken in 1904. However, only about 2 percent of these roads were classified as improved.

Associations representing bicycle riders, threshermen and auto owners began campaigning for better roads in the early 1900s, and Iowans became more vocal in demanding roads which would make travel between different areas of the state easier.

In response to these demands the Iowa Legislature designated Iowa State College as the highway commission in 1904. The highway commission was to devise plans and methods for construction and maintenance of roads, and to disseminate that information to the county supervisors and other persons involved with highways.

Communities recognized, even at this early state of Iowa's development, the importance of good roads to their towns. To promote roads, communities along a route would cooperate in the development of that road. Each community was responsible for the maintenance of a certain portion of the road, and the upkeep of the markers for that route. This cooperation spread from community to community, and continuous routes soon crisscrossed the state.

In 1913 the Iowa Legislature recognized the need for greater coordination in the road system, and formed the Iowa State Highway Commission, which had general supervisory control over all county and township road officials.

At the same time, the Legislature enacted a law to protect the names of the highways which had been developed by the communities. The Highway Commission was given the responsibility for registering the routes, including the authority to decide who had priority for the use of route names, color combinations and designs for continuous routes of 25 miles or more in length.

A primary road law passed in 1919 provided federal aid for building and improving roads, and in 1920, the Highway Commission began numbering the road systems. The registration of routes by associations promoting continuous routes was continued through 1924, but in 1925 it was decided the official highway markings placed by the state highway departments had replaced the need for registered route markings.

In addition, in 1925 the American Association of State Highway Officials suggested highway markings use standardized information and directional signs. In the same year the U.S. Congress also approved a nationwide road numbering plan which assigned odd numbers to north-south routes, and even numbers to east-west routes.

There were 64 routes registered with the Iowa State Highway Commission between 1913 and 1924. These routes are shown on this map over a background of the current Transportation Map.
